Internships and Fellowships: Congressional, Federal, and Other Work Experience Opportunities

Summary

To assist congressional offices in responding to requests for information about internships, fellowships, and other work experience programs, CRS has prepared this report on congressional internships, as well as internships in the federal government's executive and judicial branches. This report provides names of organizations, like the American Association for the Advancement of Science, which sponsors fellowships on Capitol Hill. This report lists Internet sites on internships and fellowships, such as the Smithsonian Institution's World Wide Web site on internships. At the end is a list of books with additional sources of information on internships, fellowships, and summer jobs. These publications can be used to identify additional work experience opportunities inside and outside the federal government. This report will be updated at least yearly.

Internships and Fellowships: Congressional, Federal, and Other Work Experience Opportunities

In response to many requests about congressional internships, other federal government internships, and congressional, judicial, and presidential fellowships, we compiled this report. Included is a guide to more sources of information on internships, fellowships, and summer jobs. This guide can be used to locate other work experiences, both inside and outside the federal government. The publications listed may be purchased, or they may be available for use in local libraries or high school or college guidance offices.

Although the terms “fellowship” and “internship” are sometimes used interchangeably in the names of specific programs, this report differentiates between fellowship and internship work experiences in the federal government. Fellowships generally are intended for persons with advanced degrees or substantial professional experience and are usually salaried positions lasting 9 months to a year or more. Internships, which are either salaried or volunteer short-term arrangements, usually require relatively little experience and are often filled by students. In addition, some programs which are called internships do not actually place persons in federal jobs. Any such programs described below are distinguished from internship programs which provide federal work experience.

Applying for an internship or fellowship is similar to applying for admission to a college or university. Check directories to see what programs are available (see the “Bibliography” section below); decide what type of internship or fellowship might be of interest; then write or telephone the sponsor for additional information and an application. Because competition is stiff in many internship and fellowship programs, with applicants often greatly exceeding the number of positions available, it is worthwhile to apply to more than one program.

Congressional Internships

Congressional internships are available both through Members of Congress and private organizations, and they are extremely competitive. Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate, congressional committees, and other congressional groups such as caucuses and study groups may appoint a person to their regular staffs and designate that person as an intern, or volunteers may be designated as interns.

The duties, responsibilities, and salaries (if any) of interns vary from office to office. Some interns are given routine office positions as clerks or messengers, while those in other offices may conduct legislative research.

LBJ (Lyndon B. Johnson) Congressional Intern Program

In 1973, H.Res. 420 created the term “LBJ Congressional Intern,” and authorized each Representative to hire up to two LBJ interns per year. However, it did not require Representatives to use this title when hiring interns. In May 1994, the program was suspended due to reductions in legislative branch employment levels.

However, Representatives can still sponsor unpaid interns who work on a voluntary basis. Volunteers are not counted on the House payroll and do not contribute to overall employment levels. Some Members may pay interns out of their regular office budgets. This option is only possible if a Member has not already reached the limit of 22 staffers and has funds available.

Other Internships in Members’ Offices

Internships are available in many Members’ offices. Descriptions of some of these opportunities are found in the publication entitled Internships in Congress (see the “Bibliography” section below).

Application for an internship in a specific Member’s office should be made through the individual Senator or Representative. Members of Congress should be addressed as follows:

Honorable _____	Honorable _____
U.S. Senate	U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20510	Washington, D.C. 20515
Tel: (202) 224-3121 (ask for Member)

Inquiries may also be addressed to congressional district offices. These addresses can be located in standard reference sources such as the Congressional Directory, which is available in many libraries and at this Internet address:

[<http://www.access.gpo.gov/congress/browse-cd-99.html>].

Internships in Congressional Committees and Organizations

Application for an internship with a congressional committee, an informal congressional group, or a legislative party organization should be made to the body or to individual Members of the committee or organization. Congressional committees and organizations are addressed as follows:

[Name of committee, etc.]	[Name of committee, etc.]
U.S. Senate	U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20510	Washington, D.C. 20515
Tel: (202) 224-3121 (ask for committee or organization)

Several congressional committees and caucuses which have longstanding intern programs are listed below:

House Committee on the Budget
House Democratic Caucus

House Republican Policy Committee
 Republican Policy Committee (Senate)
 Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee

Other congressional bodies may also have internship opportunities available. Congressional committees and organizations covering various subject areas can be identified in such reference sources as the Congressional Directory (Washington, GPO); the Congressional Staff Directory (Washington, CQ Press); the Congressional Yellow Book (Washington, Leadership Directories); and the Washington Information Directory (Washington, Congressional Quarterly). For information on congressional caucuses, study groups, and other informal congressional organizations, the Congressional Yellow Book is particularly useful. One or more of these reference works can be consulted in many local public or research libraries.

Congressional Internships Offered by Universities and Private Organizations

In addition to internships available directly from Members of Congress and congressional committees, various universities and private organizations offer programs which place interns in congressional offices. Some of these programs also place interns in other federal government agencies. Students should check with their own colleges and universities to see if they operate congressional intern programs. School placement offices can be useful sources of such listings, along with electronic bulletin boards or World Wide Web sites.

Internships in Congressional Support Agencies

The three congressional support agencies listed below offer internships. Interns are not placed in congressional offices but instead work in these organizations, which provide research support and information to the Congress.

Congressional Budget Office

Note: The Congressional Budget Office (CBO) provides Congress with budget-related information and explains possible budget ramifications of proposed bills reported by congressional committees. College students and recent college graduates can apply for paid 10-week summer internships in which they would work on analyses in CBO's various divisions.

Congressional Research Service

Note: The Congressional Research Service (CRS) is a legislative branch research agency which provides information upon request to Members and committees. Volunteer interns assist CRS staff in responding to public policy related inquiries. This program is open to college undergraduates, graduate students, post-graduate students, faculty, and other professionals.

Other Federal Government Internships

Federal agency internships are very popular and highly competitive. Many agencies hire seasonal employees for the summer. Those seeking such jobs should realize that hiring in federal agencies is decentralized, which means that each agency generally hires staff through its own personnel office. Candidates should identify agencies appropriate to their interests by using standard reference directories, and apply directly to the appropriate personnel offices.

Students working toward undergraduate or graduate degrees, technical school certificates, or high school diplomas are eligible for the U.S. Office of Personnel Management (OPM) Student Educational Employment Program, which provides federal job opportunities to students through the Student Temporary Employment Program (STEP) and the Student Career Experience Program (SCEP). For more information on either program, students should contact their school's guidance office or the career planning and placement office or the employment office in the federal agency in which the student is interested in working. Additional information on STEP and SCEP is available on the OPM Web site at [<http://www.opm.gov/employ/students/intro.htm>].

On July 10, 2000, OPM announced a new Federal Career Intern Program. Established by Executive Order 13162, this program is designed to help agencies recruit and attract highly qualified people into various occupations. It is intended for positions at grade levels GS-5, GS-7, and GS-9. Generally, people are appointed to a 2-year internship. After successfully completing the internship, the intern may be eligible for a permanent job within an agency. Those interested in Career Intern opportunities must contact specific agencies directly. Additional details about the program and OPM's December 14, 2000, interim regulations governing it are available on the OPM Web site at [<http://www.opm.gov/careernintern/index.htm>].

Other established internship programs within the federal government can be found by using publications listed in the bibliography. However, persons can also "create" internships by contacting relevant federal offices and inquiring about internship possibilities. Addresses and telephone numbers of government departments and agencies and information about them appear in the United States Government Manual (Washington, GPO). This work is available in many libraries and on the GAO Web site at [<http://www.access.gpo.gov/nara/browse-gm-00.html>].

Other useful resources include the Washington Information Directory (Washington, CQ Press), the Federal Yellow Book (Washington, Leadership Directories); the Federal Staff Directory and Judicial Staff Directory (Washington, CQ Press); and Carroll's Federal Directory and Carroll's Federal Regional Directory (Bethesda, MD, Carroll Publishing). Detailed subject and keyword indexes in these works help in identifying government offices in specific subject fields and professions. One or more of the directories can often be used in larger libraries. Persons interested in setting up internships should contact the relevant federal offices directly.

Fellowships in the Federal Government

The following selected programs place fellowship recipients, generally for one-year terms, in congressional offices, federal agencies, or the Supreme Court of the United States. Congressional programs predominate in the listing; placement is in Member or committee offices unless otherwise noted. One may also wish to contact individual federal agencies about additional fellowship programs. The works in the previous section can be used to identify relevant federal offices.

Electronic Resources

By using the Internet, it is possible to identify and find out about many current internship and fellowship opportunities. Researchers may be able to use the Internet in large public or research libraries, and students may have access through their college or university libraries. Because up-to-date information is critical when applying, the Internet can provide current descriptions of internship and fellowships and find deadlines, application materials, and other relevant details. Since the Internet offers a wealth of materials in such fields as career guidance, summer job opportunities, etc., this selective list of Web sites provides a starting point for those seeking data on available programs.

Action Without Borders [<http://www.idealists.org>]

A non-profit organization that promotes action on numerous issues of concern, Action Without Borders' Web site offers a database of internships with non-profits and with consultants and firms serving the non-profit sector. These are arranged by field of interest, geographical region, etc., and summaries of available opportunities are provided.

Inroads [<http://www.inroadsinc.org>]

This St. Louis-based organization matches minority youth with summer internships in business and industry.

International Study and Travel Center [<http://www.istc.umn.edu/>]

This site contains information on service and internship opportunities in developing countries and Eastern Europe.

Smithsonian Fellowship/Internship Opportunities

[<http://www.si.edu/cms/#interns>]

Information is provided on fellowships and internships at the Smithsonian Institution's museums and research institutes.

Washington Center [<http://www.twc.edu/internships/index.htm>]

This organization arranges off-campus internships in the Washington, D.C., area for college students from all majors in government agencies, corporations, and non-profit organizations.

Bibliography

This selective bibliography lists more sources of information on internships, fellowships, and summer job and service opportunities. The publications can be used to locate additional work experience opportunities, both inside and outside the federal government. The works may be available in local libraries or school or college guidance offices. Publisher contact information is also provided. Notes identify publications which are issued annually. Other publications are updated irregularly; check with the publishers for information on the latest editions. Some of the publishers have Web sites, which are provided.

America's Top Internships. New York: Random House, Inc. Annual.

Selected internships in fields ranging from law and government to publishing, finance, and education are described in this guide.
